The following text is for questions no. 23 to 28.

Mt. Everest rises 29,035 feet above sea level, making it the tallest mountain on earth. It is found in Asia in the Himalayan mountain range on the border between Nepal and Tibet.

Everest was named for Sir George Everest, the first person to record its height and location. Tibetans call it Chomolangma (Goddess Mother of the Snows); the Nepalese call it Sagarmatha (Mother of the Universe).

There are two main routes for climbing Everest: the northwest ridge in Tibet and the southeast ridge in Nepal. In 1921, British explorers investigated the Tibetan route. At that time, the Nepal border was closed to foreigners. In 1924, two British climbers attempted to reach the top of Everest, but they never returned. This route was tried until 1950 when China took control of Tibet and closed its borders.

When Nepal opened its border in 1949, climbers began using the southeast ridge. On May 29, 1953, Everest was finally conquered by Edmund Hillary of New Zealand and Tenzing Norgay, his Sherpa guide, using this route.

By 2001, almost 1,500 climbers had reached the summit. Of the 175 who died on Everest, 42 reached the summit but died on the way down.

In 1975, Junko Tabei of Japan became the first woman to reach its summit. In 1978, Reinhold Messner of Italy climbed it without taking extra oxygen tanks and in 1980 he climbed it alone. In 2003, 15-year-old Mingkipa Sherpa of Nepal became the youngest person to reach the top and 70-year-old Yuichiro Miura of Japan became the oldest. Local Sherpa guides have set many other records.

The following text is for questions no. 42 to 45.

Once upon a time there was a strange bear who lived in a jungle. He had five feet. But all animals who lived with him didn't feel strange. The five footed bear liked to help other animals. His home was open for anyone who wanted to stay.

One afternoon, when the five footed bear went home, he found a rabbit under a mahogany tree. The rabbit looked hungry. Then the five footed bear brought him to his home.

The next day, when the five footed bear was looking for meal, the rabbit helped him clean up the house. While the rabbit was working, a monkey and a mouse deer came quietly. They pretended to be robbers. They wanted to disturb the rabbit.

The rabbit was frightened. The monkey and the mouse deer tied up the rabbit's legs and plugged his mouth. Fortunately the five footed bear came and released him. The rabbit was upset because the bear wasn't angry with the monkey and the mouse deer. In fact, the five footed bear let them live in his house.

On the next day the monkey and the mouse deer asked the rabbit to forgive them. They helped him clean up the house. In the evening when the bear was coming home, he brought them meals and a new friend. The monkey and the mouse deer were very afraid knowing who the new friend was. He was a tiger. But the rabbit wasn't afraid. The tiger was one of the rabbit's best friends. The monkey and the mouse deer didn't know it. The monkey and the mouse deer were very embarrassed. That was the cleverness of the five footed bear. He wanted to make them aware of their bad habit of frightening the rabbit. Then they sat and enjoyed their dinner together.
